The first special dispatches from British headquarters in France since the present activities began appear in the morning newspapers to-day. They lay emphasis on the heavy shelling to which the British have subjected the German lines on a front of ninety miles. One dispatch tells of the obliteration of an entire village which the Germans had been using for billet purposes and adds:

The correspondent concludes with the surmise that those troops fighting there have changed their mind about the character of the action. He says the slow progress and hard fighting were due to the swamps and the overwhelming superiority of the Russians in numbers. In one might, he adds, they put into action nearly two entire divisions against a couple of German regiments.

It is asserted that the Petrolite did not swing around as if to ram the submarine, but did stop and so swing as to show to the U-boat its name, painted in letters six feet long, its hailing port and two large American flags, which were flying before the first shot was fired. The note points out that the shell which struck the steamer was fired from a point 45 degrees on the starboard bow, showing that the vessel was not headed toward the submarine.

As the steamer had stopped her engines end was making no headway, it is declared, the U-boat commander could not suppose himself in danger of being rammed, and, it is added, "the conduct of the submarine commander showed lack of judgment, self-control
